Osteoarthritis (OA) is the most common type of arthritis causing a significant deterioration in patients’ quality of life. The current status of regenerative therapies in OA along with their conceptual strategy and future directions will be discussed, together with new ideas on the origins and fates of chondrogenic cells, as well as the opportunity to use digital mobility biomarkers for diagnosis and outcome assessment of OA.